Sportsmen Start ShootingBill Proposing Control Of Arizona Land By Army Held Unneccessary

Legislation introduced in the 22nd Legislature to grant blanket, exclusive jurisdiction to military forces over any area of Arizona taken over by any armed service came under fire yesterday from sportsmen and the state game department.

John Hall, director of the Arizona Game and Fish Commission, said the department has several opinions from the attorney general advising that Arizona has gained jurisdiction over fish game since statehood, and that the state would be wise to retain such jurisdiction. Navaajo Ordnance Depot several years ago.

And Lee Hover, former president of the Arizona Game Protective Association, said he has been advised that the act which the present proposal seeks to amend is unconstitutional, because the title of the bill as passed by the legislature in 1951 did not cover the items in the bill.

"But these agreements do not bind successive commanding officers, and to avoid confusion and continual negotiation of agreements, these matters should be clarified by law," he added.

"This legislation was passed as a measure to return title to Fort Huachuca to the federal government," Hover declared, "and the people of the state, including their representatives in the legislature, never were told of its far-reaching effect."

Hover said the military now has under its control about five million acres in Arizona, but has no facilities for proper policing, and no interest in policing the area or managing the wildlife or other resources that would come under its exclusive control by such legislation.

He said the question already has been raised as to whether the military actually needed many thousands of acres it already has taken, citing as an example the Yuma Engineering Test Station which now embraces around two million acres.

"Just because Arizona has millions of acres of vacant land is no reason why it should be preempted on an extravagant basis by military agencies, with no requirement that they should be used for anything," he said.
